The "Chin-don" Performance

Profile of "Chin-don Ya" ("Chin-don Performers")

"Chin-don Ya" is a Japan's unique, original form of advertising and publicity agency. This business was born at the end of the Edo era, more than 100 years ago before the modernization of Japan. Originally, only the voices of performers were used as a method for advertisement. When requested by a shop owner or a theater to perform, the performers marched from street to street, calling out to residents, workers or passersby in the neighborhood using their voice to advertise. It was the origin of the Chin-don Ya.

Over the years, the performers began to use various music instruments, such as "Chin-don daiko (dram)," and act as a famous play or movie character of the days to raise advertising effects, in other words, to attract more people. They have eventually established their unique, contemporary style. The "Chin-don Ya," which was born as an ad agency, has flourished into the ordinary people's culture and Japan's unique feature.

After the stormy post-war era, Japan has achieved a dramatic economic growth. With the development of mass media as well as the expansion of public transportation system, the Chin-don Ya as a street business began to decline. Few wanted to take over the business, saying it was out of date.

However, as the material culture began to reach a point of saturation in the end of 20th century, the trend to cherish a minimum bond or man-to-man communication has burgeoned. Many have then shed a new light on the effectiveness of the Chin-don Ya as one of the best communication methods. Now the Chin-don Ya perform not only in the streets, but also at various festivals or events.
